

Overview

Every government function depends on information - to devise policies, craft programs, manage operations, or evaluate performance. Information can be a strategic resource to bring about significant changes in goals, processes, behavior, and relationships. Strategic thinking about data needs, information access, and information sharing and integration can lead to redesigned programs, greater efficiency, and better quality services.